The Natixis* Global Retirement Index (GRI) examines key factors that drive retirement security across 44 countries:

Material Wellbeing: retirees’ ability to live comfortably in retirement;
Health: access to quality health services;
Finances: access to quality financial services and the ability to preserve savings;
Quality of Life: whether a country can provide a clean, safe environment in which to live.

From uncertain economics to the demographics of an aging population to climate change, global retirement security faces a wide range of modern risks. These issues have sweeping implications for a sustainable society. The 2019 Index reveals three key threats to retirement security—interest rates, demographics, and climate change—and what they mean for individuals and institutions.

The United States falls two spots this year in the overall rankings. It is below the top 25 countries for Material Wellbeing; 10th on both the Health and Finance factors; and 20th on Quality of Life.

Farther down the list are the United States at 18th place and India last. The country’s Material Wellbeing performance (28th) takes a hit because of lower income equality and income per capita scores. However, these two indicators sit at opposite ends of the wellbeing performance spectrum, with income equality ranking eighth lowest and income per capita sixth highest among all GRI countries.

A lower score for the happiness indicator weighs on the country’s overall Quality of Life performance (20th). A slight improvement in the environmental factors indicator is not...
On a splendid October day, 48 HURA members and guests journeyed to the Harvard Forest in Petersham, MA. They were treated to a morning talk by David Foster, Senior Lecturer on Biology and Director of the Harvard Forest, including the history of the department and the status of U.S. and New England forests, both past and present. The group then adjourned for a buffet lunch. After lunch some took a detailed guided walk of the forest, while a few elected a longer walk to a forest observation site.

Windows 7 support to end

After 10 years, Microsoft has announced that support for its Windows 7 operating system is coming to an end on January 14, 2020. The company says that they know change can be difficult, so they are available to help with recommendations for what to do next and to answer questions about end of support.

When Windows 7 reaches the end of support on January 14, your computer will still function, but Microsoft will no longer provide support for any issue, software updates, or security updates or fixes. While you could continue to use your PC running Windows 7, without continued software and security updates, it will be at greater risk for viruses and malware. Going forward, the best way for you to stay secure is on Windows 10. And the best way to experience Windows 10 is on a new PC. While it is possible to install Windows 10 on your older device, it is not recommended.

To find which version of Windows your PC is running, type “Which version of Windows operating system am I running?” into the search box on your browser or Google. Or go to: www.support.microsoft.com/en-us/help/13443/windows-which-version-am-i-running.

enough to lift it out of the bottom ten, finishing ninth-lowest among all GRI countries. The air quality indicator, where the country achieves the seventh highest score, represents a bright spot.

A weaker performance in the tax pressure indicator is the primary cause of a lower score (10th) in the Finances index. The old-age dependency and government indebtedness indicators see more modest falls. Meanwhile, the U.S. languishes in the bottom ten for government indebtedness, ranking sixth-lowest among all GRI countries.

The U.S. Health index score (10th) falls due to a weaker showing in the life expectancy indicator. [Depressed because of deaths from opioid use.] But it manages to improve its performance in insured health expenditure, which climbs up the rankings from 6th to 3rd.

In addition, it boasts the highest score for health expenditure per capita among all GRI countries—but still comes in 10th on health access overall.

The White House, a brief history

Lately, the news focuses heavily on what’s happening in the White House. Pictures of it as background for commentators show the stately residence of the U.S. President. But how much do you know about the building itself?

Our first president, George Washington, selected the site for the White House in 1791. The cornerstone was laid in 1792, and a competition design submitted by Irish-born architect James Hoban was chosen. After eight years of construction, President John Adams and his wife, Abigail, moved into the still unfinished house in 1800. George Washington never lived there.

During the War of 1812, in 1814, the British set fire to the President’s House, and James Hoban was appointed to rebuild it. President James Monroe moved into the building in 1817. During Monroe’s administration, the South Portico was constructed in 1824, and Andrew Jackson oversaw the addition of the North Portico in 1829. During the late 19th century, various proposals were made to significantly expand the President’s House or to build an entirely new house for the president, but these plans were never realized.

In 1902, President Theodore Roosevelt began a major renovation, including the relocation of the President’s offices from the second floor of the Residence to the newly constructed temporary Executive Office Building (now known as the West Wing). The Roosevelt renovation was planned and carried out by the famous New York architectural firm McKim, Mead, and White. Roosevelt’s successor, President William Howard Taft, had the Oval Office constructed within an enlarged office wing.

Less than fifty years after the Roosevelt renovation, the White House was showing signs of serious structural weakness. President Harry S. Truman began a renovation of the building in which everything but the outer walls was dismantled. The reconstruction was overseen by architect Lorenzo Winslow, and the Truman family moved back into the White House in 1952.

Every president since John Adams has occupied the White House, and the history of this building extends far beyond the construction of its walls. From the Ground Floor Corridor rooms, transformed from their early use as service areas, to the State Floor rooms, where countless leaders and dignitaries have been entertained, the White House is both the home of the President of the United States and his family and a museum of American history. It is a place where history continues to unfold.

There are 132 rooms, 35 bathrooms, and 6 levels in the Residence. There are also 412 doors, 147 windows, 28 fireplaces, 8 staircases, and 3 elevators. The White House kitchen is able to serve dinner to as many as 140 seated guests and hors d’oeuvres to more than 1,000.

At various times in history, the White House has been known as the “President’s Palace,” the “President’s House,” and the “Executive Mansion.” President Theodore Roosevelt officially gave the White House its current name in 1901.

HURA Goes to the movies: Poms
Sometimes movies seem appropriate for an older crowd. Here’s a recent one that got good reviews.

Martha (Diane Keaton), a woman who is slowly dying of cancer, decides to move to a retirement community to die. Martha checks in and meets the supervisor of the community, who gives her a tour and explains that every resident must participate in an extracurricular activity. That night, Martha tries to sleep but is unable due to the loud noise coming from her neighbor, Sheryl’s house. Martha calls the community deputy to stop the noise. Sheryl and her party sneak into Martha’s house to evade the deputy. After a brief conversation, Sheryl convinces a very annoyed Martha to let her party there. From that night on, Sheryl becomes very interested in becoming Martha’s friend, inviting her to various meet and greets, which Martha ignores. After a little while, Martha gives in, and she and Sheryl get to know each other better. Sheryl learns that when Martha was young she was a cheerleader but quit before her first game to take care of her ill mother. Sheryl convinces Martha to start a cheerleading squad with her fellow residents, as the supervisor said that it was ok to start a club.
